

Riseguide Reputation Scorecard

Independent weekly reputation analysis · July 20, 2026

KEYWORDS ANALYSED

- riseguide
- riseguide app
- riseguide reviews

COMPOSITE SCORE

July 20, 2026

5.5/10

▲ +0.1

was 5.4 · July 13, 2026

REVIEW PLATFORM SCORES

Trustpilot

4.4

23,089 reviews

Apple App Store

4.6

16,707 reviews

Google Play

4.2

3,602 reviews

Reviews.io

4.6

260 reviews

RealReviews.io

4.5

116 reviews

BBB

13

11 unresolved / 3 yr

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY · THIS WEEK VS LAST WEEK

			LAST WEEK	CURRENT	Δ
01	Product Quality		7.2/10	7.2/10	— 0.0
02	Customer Service		5.8/10	5.8/10	— 0.0
03	User Feedback		6.6/10	6.7/10	▲ +0.1
04	Billing Transparency		3.2/10	3.2/10	— 0.0
05	Brand Trust & Legitimacy		4.4/10	4.5/10	▲ +0.1

▲ TOP IMPROVEMENTS THIS WEEK

03 User Feedback

6.7_{/10} ▲ +0.1

Sentiment & platform consistency — Last week's sliding store turned around. Google Play's negative sentiment nearly halved, its one-star reviews fell from eighteen to fourteen, and its five-star reviews jumped from thirty-four to sixty-two — pulling its rating back above 4.2. The App Store softened slightly in return, but the net move is clearly positive and it's the biggest genuine improvement anywhere in the report: the checkout anger that migrated to Google Play last week eased rather than deepened.

05 Brand Trust & Legitimacy

4.5_{/10} ▲ +0.1

Third-party recognition — The independent voices outsiders trust most grew friendlier on both ends this week. Creator reviews climbed to 80% positive from 73%, and — the harder signal — their comment sections warmed alongside them, with negative comments falling to roughly one in ten. For months the story was enthusiastic creators over skeptical crowds; this week that gap narrowed instead of widening, and no new scam-framed video gained any traction.

▼ TOP DECLINES THIS WEEK

No dimensions declined this week — every dimension held flat or moved up week-over-week.

01

Product Quality

- 0.0

7.2/10

The two app stores swapped roles again — but this week the flip carries good news. Google Play, last week's problem child, rebounded hard: its angry reviews thinned and its rating climbed. The App Store softened slightly in the other direction, though its billing complaints eased. Underneath all the store churn the product itself is unmoved — the people who finish the structured journey still rate it near-perfect, and satisfied-user praise hit its highest level in the record. The complaints that remain attack trust and billing, not the lessons.

Marketing vs realityMixed · 6.5

The 'it's really just AI content' jab has settled into a permanent low hum rather than a growing threat. It still surfaces on both stores and in video comments — one commenter this week shrugged that matching cards 'counts as brain training' — but it never dents the core: 65 of 100 App Store reviews and 62 of 100 Google Play reviews landed at five stars. The framing questions the brand's honesty, not the product's usefulness, so the score holds.

Unique value propositionHealthy · 7.5

The structured-journey format is the one thing that strengthens no matter what else moves. Satisfied-user praise hit its highest level in the record this week — 102 App Store reviews and 37 Google Play reviews singled it out, averaging close to five stars — with 'genuinely helpful, easy to follow' still the densest positive theme anywhere in the data. While the two stores pulled in opposite directions on sentiment, the reason people love the product only deepened.

Accessibility & consistencyHealthy · 7.5

The stability worry we'd been tracking on the App Store finally reversed. Bug mentions there fell from eight to five after two weeks of drift, and none carried the one-star fury that signals a real break. The only new wrinkle is on Google Play, where speed and performance complaints doubled to six at a middling 2.8-star average — worth a glance, not an alarm. Net, reliability perception held steady this week.

02

Customer Service

— 0.0

5.8/10

Support held its shape this week — everyone gets an answer, not everyone gets a resolution — but the tone improved wherever it's visible. On the App Store, customer service kept surfacing as unprompted praise, and on Google Play the handful of support mentions turned positive too. The unchanged truth underneath: the whole operation still runs on one email inbox with no live-chat or phone fallback, so a real complaint spike has nowhere to overflow — and billing complaints remain exactly the kind a fast reply still can't close.

Support channel availabilityMixed · 6

Coverage hasn't changed — email and the help portal still carry every conversation, with no live chat or phone line. The model holds while volume is steady, but it has no shock absorber: when billing anger concentrates on one store, the same single inbox absorbs all of it. The next improvement that would actually move this score is a tooling investment — a self-serve billing and cancellation flow — not another support hire.

Response speed & qualityMixed · 6.5

Support stayed visible for the right reasons this week. Customer service drew ten App Store mentions averaging 4.3 stars and three on Google Play averaging a perfect five — customers volunteering that the team is responsive and helpful rather than raising a problem. It's a reminder that when this team surfaces in reviews, it's usually because someone had a good experience. Speed of reply is a solved problem here; the unfinished work sits one criterion down.

Complaint resolution rateMixed · 5

Every unhappy customer still gets a reply — every negative review on the App Store, Google Play and Trustpilot drew a company response this week — but a reply still isn't a fix. Google Play billing reviews describe being charged 'at a higher charge than the first' with 'no chance to cancel,' and one customer 'can't find a way to cancel the subscription.' Responsiveness is reliable; converting that reply into a resolved refund is where the billing anger keeps pooling.

03

User Feedback

▲ +0.1

6.7/10

The top-line stayed healthy and the movement underneath finally broke in the brand's favor. Last week Google Play was the platform sliding; this week it clearly recovered — angry reviews thinned, its five-star reviews nearly doubled, and its rating climbed back above 4.2. Volume kept compounding across every platform without dragging ratings down. The one unchanged asterisk is the one that matters most: the glowing Trustpilot average still rests almost entirely on reviews the company invited.

Review volume & rating

Healthy · 8.3

▲ +0.1

Growth stayed broad and — for once — a rating moved up, not just sideways. Trustpilot added 615 reviews this week, a 2.7% increase, holding at 4.4 stars, and Google Play grew about 3.5% while its rating recovered from 4.1 to 4.2. The App Store passed 16,700 reviews at 4.6. When volume keeps rising this steadily and the softest store actually improves, it reads as genuine momentum rather than a solicitation push. The clean part of the picture got a little cleaner.

Sentiment & platform consistency

Mixed · 5.5

▲ +0.5

The store that was sliding last week reversed course. Google Play's negative sentiment nearly halved, its one-star reviews fell from eighteen to fourteen, and its five-star reviews jumped from thirty-four to sixty-two. The App Store softened mildly in the other direction — a few more one-star reviews — but the dominant move was Google Play's recovery, and satisfied-user praise grew on both stores. This is the biggest genuinely positive swing in the report this week.

Review authenticity signals

Mixed · 4.8

The number that structurally caps this dimension didn't move. About 98% of Trustpilot reviews this week still came from company invitations, and the single compliance flag is a routine billing information-request, not a fraud allegation — the same benign picture as last week. The independent tracker RealReviews held steady at 4.5 stars. Nothing worsened, but nothing resolved the core question either: a near-perfect average built almost entirely on solicited reviews.

Company responsiveness to reviews

Healthy · 8.3

Still the cleanest signal on the board. Every negative review on the App Store, Google Play and Trustpilot got a company reply this week, and overall reply coverage held at essentially 100% across all three. Whatever stays contested about how RiseGuide gathers its reviews, no unhappy customer is being left unanswered — a defensible, genuine strength that costs nothing to maintain and quietly underwrites the rest of the reputation story.

Billing is still the brand's deepest wound, and this week it split in two. Surprise-charge complaints — the 'charged without warning' kind — eased on both stores, a small but genuine relief. But pricing complaints on Google Play nearly doubled and stayed furious, decoupling from the store's otherwise-improving mood: users there are happier overall yet angrier about the price. The mechanism behind all of it is unchanged and singular — there's still no cancel button inside the app, so users feel trapped in a renewal they never clearly agreed to. One commenter laid out the exact grievance: '$19.99 for 4 weeks... and then $41,' with no easy exit.

Price disclosure

Mixed · 4.3▼ -0.2

The contradiction this week is the story: Google Play users grew happier overall, yet their pricing complaints nearly doubled — from seven to thirteen — at a punishing 2.2-star average, while App Store pricing complaints eased in the other direction. The recurring grievance is unchanged and specific: a price users read as one-time that quietly becomes a higher recurring charge, described this week as 'a higher charge than the first' with 'no chance to cancel.' The relief on one store is cancelled by the jump on the other.

Hidden / recurring charges

Critical · 2.3▲ +0.3

Still the worst signal on the entire scorecard — but for the first time in a while it ticked the right way. Surprise-charge complaints eased on both stores, from twelve to eight on the App Store and seven to five on Google Play. The reviews behind them stay brutal, averaging around one star: 'Subscription of 19.99, charge received of 49.99, even with automatic renewal disabled.' The volume eased; the fury per review didn't, and the charge-confirmation fix still hasn't shipped.

Ease of cancellation

Mixed · 4

The missing in-app cancel button is still the single mechanism tying every billing complaint together. This week's reviews repeat it almost word for word: 'no chance to cancel on Play Store,' 'I can't find a way to cancel the subscription.' The help guide still rescues whoever finds it, but it can't close the product gap that turns a billing surprise into a fraud accusation. Linking the guide from the in-app billing screen is the cheap half of the fix; a real in-app cancel path is the half that matters.

UI dark patterns

Critical · 2.3

The pattern the company itself acknowledges — charging before a clearly stated renewal date, with no email receipt — kept generating the same reviews this week. A YouTube commenter spelled out the exact funnel: '$19.99 for 4 weeks — if you try to leave without signing up it drops to $15.99 — and then $41.' The one steadying fact is that compliance flags stayed at a single routine billing query, not the fraud accusations that spiked earlier this summer. The perception that checkout is engineered against the user hasn't softened.

Refund policy clarity & enforcementCritical · 3

Refunds still run on negotiation, not policy. This week a Google Play customer says they've been charged repeatedly on an app they stopped using and still 'can't find a way to cancel,' with no clear refund path offered. With no refund policy published on the website, every outcome depends on which agent happens to answer. A clear, public refund policy remains the cheapest credibility fix anywhere in this dimension — and its absence is what keeps every refund a fresh argument.

The 'is this legit?' question is still answered mostly by outsiders — but this week the outside voices grew a little friendlier and the brand reclaimed a bit of its own search ground. Independent creators skewed more positive and their audiences turned less skeptical; the search results for 'riseguide' went uniformly positive as a third-party review aggregator dropped out of view. The persistent hole is unchanged and glaring: the founder appears nowhere. A named, photographed leadership page remains the single highest-value fix in the entire scorecard, and it still doesn't exist.

Company age & history

Critical · 3

Still young and still faceless. The company is roughly two years old and the app about six months, and the only public record of who runs it remains a name on business-registration filings. Time will harden into credibility on its own eventually, but the one lever available today — a real founder story attached to a real person — still hasn't been pulled, and nothing this week changed that.

Legal & brand identity alignment

Mixed · 5.3

The acute legal-risk signal stayed calm for a second week. The compliance flags that spiked into blunt fraud accusations earlier this summer are still down to a single routine billing query, and no scam-flagging site cracked the top search results for the brand. It's not a clean bill of health — reviewers still reach for 'scam' when a charge surprises them — but the sharpest fraud signal has settled, and the criterion holds the ground it recovered last week.

Third-party recognition

Mixed · 5

▲ +0.3

Independent coverage strengthened on both sides this week. Creator videos ran 80% positive, up from 73%, and — more tellingly — their comment sections warmed too, with negative comments dropping to about one in ten. The long-standing gap between enthusiastic creators and skeptical audiences narrowed rather than widened. A top review video has been seen over 62,000 times, and no new scam-framed video gained traction. The lone holdout is a persistent comment: 'Scam!!!!!! Beware!! I was charged but I could not access the app.'

Leadership transparency

Critical · 3

The longest-running flat line in the report, and still the biggest free win. No founder bio, no About page, no leadership presence anywhere in this week's search results — again — while reviewers openly accuse the brand of fraud. The absence of a named, photographed person to stand behind the product isn't a missing nicety; it's the void those accusations rush to fill. A short founder bio with a real photo remains the single highest score-per-effort fix anywhere in this scorecard.

Online presence consistencyMixed · 6.3*▲ +0.3

RiseGuide won back a little of the search ground it lost last week. The results for 'riseguide' turned uniformly positive — the lone negative link from last week dropped out — and a third-party review aggregator that had been ranking, riseguidereviews.com, fell out of the top results, leaving the brand's own pages and app-store listings to define the first impression. Where RiseGuide controls the message, the branding stays perfectly consistent across the website, both stores and Trustpilot.