01

Product Quality

- 0.0

7.1/10

The product itself is in better shape than the reviews suggest — and the story this week is that the two stores have split. On the App Store, last month's performance scare has fully healed and bug complaints are now resolved-and-positive. The negative product reviews that remain aren't really about the product: they're billing rage with a line about 'rehashed information' tacked on. The content delivers; the checkout is what poisons the reviews.

Marketing vs realityMixed · 6.3

The gap between what's promised and what's delivered has narrowed to a billing problem, not a product one. App Store bug complaints resolved this week (now 4.3 stars, up from 3.6) and performance steadied. The remaining negative reviews pair refund anger with a throwaway 'rehashed information' line — the complaint is about being charged, not about the learning content itself.

Unique value propositionHealthy · 7.3

The structured-journey format keeps earning unprompted praise at a density nothing else in the data matches. 70 App Store reviews this week landed in the 'satisfied users' theme averaging 4.8 stars (up from 63 last week), 13 specifically praised how approachable the format is, and design drew 12 mentions at 4.8 stars. The core experience is the asset; the friction is everywhere around it.

Accessibility & consistencyHealthy · 7.8

The performance worry from last month is now a strength — App Store users mention it more (10 reviews, up from 7) yet rate it 3.8 stars, up from 3.0, and bugs resolved to 4.3. Ratings hold steady where the brand is strongest (Trustpilot 4.4, App Store 4.6). The one soft spot is Google Play, where the average slipped to 4.1 for the second week running.

02

Customer Service

— 0.0

5.7/10

The reply machine recovered the miss that broke its streak last week — both app stores answered every negative review this cycle, and reviewers are now naming individual support agents as the reason they stayed. The structural caveat is unchanged: a reply is not a resolution. And the responsiveness risk didn't disappear — it quietly moved from the App Store to Trustpilot, where the reply rate slipped for the first time in our tracking.

Support channel availabilityMixed · 6

Coverage is unchanged — email and the help portal carry everything, with no live chat or phone tier. The exceptional reply density is happening through manual effort, not tooling, which means the real question isn't which channels exist but how far the team can scale this hands-on approach before volume becomes the bottleneck.

Response speed & qualityMixed · 6.5

Support has become something reviewers single out by name. The customer-support theme grew to 16 App Store mentions this week (up from 14) at 4.3 stars, and reviews now thank specific agents — one wrote that 'Andrew helped me instantly' with a refund. The reply-quality work the team has invested in is showing up as named, personal endorsements.

Complaint resolution rateMixed · 4.5

The 'every unhappy customer hears back' promise is fully restored — both app stores replied to 100% of negative reviews this week, with the App Store closing last week's lone gap. But answering is not resolving: the historical formal-resolution record stays far below the reply rate, and that gap is why this criterion sits where it does despite near-perfect responsiveness.

03

User Feedback

6.3/10

Last week's headline — a record positive sentiment spike — was a one-week event, and it has now partly reversed. The reversal is almost entirely a Google Play story: machine sentiment there collapsed from 82% positive to 61% in a single week. The reassuring part is where the lost positives went — to neutral, not to anger; outright dissatisfied mentions actually fell again. The harder truth sits underneath the ratings: 98% of the Trustpilot reviews producing the 4.4-star average came from company invitations.

Review volume & ratingHealthy · 7.3

Volume growth is healthy in aggregate — but the blended number hides a real split. Trustpilot added 437 reviews this week (a 2.5% increase) at a stable 4.4 stars, and the App Store added 331 at 4.6. Google Play added just 39 and its average slipped to 4.1 — down for the second week in a row. The headline grows while the weakest store quietly erodes.

Sentiment & platform consistencyMixed · 5.5

The record positive spike was a single-week event and has now reversed, almost entirely on Google Play, where machine sentiment dropped from 82% positive to 61% and negative reviews rose to 29%. The silver lining: the lost positives moved to neutral, not to anger — outright dissatisfied mentions fell again, to just 4 across both stores. This is a confidence wobble, not a revolt.

Review authenticity signalsMixed · 4.5

The share of Trustpilot reviews that came from company invitations is now 98% — essentially the entire visible review stream is solicited rather than spontaneous. The one bright spot: one of the two reviews Trustpilot's own compliance team had flagged has cleared, leaving one. The independent authenticity tracker RealReviews still places RiseGuide mid-pack at 4.3 stars. The rating is real; the audience producing it is almost entirely a company-selected list.

Company responsiveness to reviewsHealthy · 8

Still the scorecard's standout — both app stores answered 100% of negative reviews this week and the App Store recovered last week's miss. But the responsiveness risk didn't vanish, it moved: Trustpilot slipped for the first time, answering 8 of 9 negative reviews and dropping overall reply coverage to 93%. Worth catching before it becomes the new pattern.

04

Billing Transparency

— 0.0

3.5/10

Last week's pricing improvement turned out to be App Store-only — and this week Google Play snapped back to the floor. Pricing, payment, performance and account complaints on Google Play all averaged exactly 1.0 stars, the rating users give when they feel robbed, not confused. The cancellation guide still helps the people who find it, but the entry path that generates the rage is untouched, and the company has now admitted the problem to reviewers without shipping a fix.

Price disclosureMixed · 5

The pricing-clarity gain was App Store-only and Google Play reversed it this week. Google Play pricing complaints dropped back to 1.0 stars (6 reviews, all negative) after climbing to 2.3 last week, while App Store pricing held around 2.3 across 13 mentions. One store is slowly improving; the other just gave back a month of progress, which is why the overall picture stalled rather than advanced.

Hidden / recurring chargesCritical · 2.5

Users feel defrauded, not misinformed — and the specifics are damning. This week's reviews describe being 'renewed 3 days early so I'd cancel after the charge' and charged 'more than the amount quoted' with no receipt. App Store payment complaints eased a little (11, down from 14) but Google Play payment sits at 1.0 stars. The explicit 'you will be charged today' confirmation step remains the single highest-leverage fix available.

Ease of cancellationMixed · 4.5

The cancellation guide works for the users who reach it — but new reviews still report being trapped: 'it will not let you cancel... they want to keep stealing your money.' The documentation exists; the problem is purely discoverability. Linking the guide from the in-app billing screen and the store listings would move this criterion without writing a word of new content.

UI dark patternsCritical · 2.3

A small positive this week — one of the two reviews Trustpilot flagged for compliance has cleared. But the underlying pattern the company itself admitted, charging before a stated renewal date, is still live and still generating reviews this week. A cleared flag is housekeeping; the dark pattern that produces the flags is the thing that hasn't moved.

Refund policy clarity & enforcementCritical · 3

Refunds still run on negotiation, not policy — and the inconsistency shows. One reviewer thanked an agent for an instant refund this week; another was offered only '50% as a special favour.' With no refund policy published on the website, every refund is a private bargain whose outcome depends on who you reach. A published policy is the cheapest credibility fix in this dimension.

05

Brand Trust & Legitimacy

— 0.0

4.4/10

The 'is this legit?' question still gets answered by everyone except the brand. A single independent creator review crossed 53,000 views this week and remains the strongest legitimacy signal RiseGuide has — but a skeptical Reddit thread now ranks first when people search 'riseguide reviews,' the founder is still anonymous, and one Trustpilot compliance flag lingers. The brand controls the answer to its own credibility and keeps declining to give one.

Company age & historyCritical · 3

Still young in category, and the only fast lever — a credible founder story — still doesn't exist. The company is roughly two years old and the app about six months. Time fixes this eventually, but right now the sole public record of who runs RiseGuide is a name in business-registration filings, which is not the kind of history that builds trust.

Legal & brand identity alignmentMixed · 5.3

The durable good news held: the main scam-flagging site stayed out of the top results for a third straight week, the brand's own domain owns 6 of the visible first-page search slots, and one of the two Trustpilot compliance flags cleared. The new wrinkle is a skeptical Reddit thread climbing to the top of 'riseguide reviews' searches — worth watching, but it's a curious user, not a fraud accusation.

Third-party recognitionMixed · 4.7

The brand's best independent endorsement keeps growing but is losing momentum — the standout creator review crossed 53,000 views (up from 51,000), and the skeptical 'is it a scam?' video stayed flat at 13,000. The catch is a creator-versus-audience split: across sampled videos 73% were positive, but their comment sections ran only 32% positive. The creators are sold; their viewers are still deciding.

Leadership transparencyCritical · 3

The longest-running flat criterion in the report. No founder bio shipped this week, no About page, no leadership presence in any search result. Meanwhile a lingering Trustpilot compliance flag keeps the identity question alive. A short, photographed founder bio remains the single most fixable lift anywhere in this scorecard — and it's been available to take for months.

Online presence consistencyMixed · 6

Where the brand controls the message it's perfectly aligned — the same support contacts appear across the website, both app stores, Trustpilot and business directories. The gap is community presence: Reddit visibility is rising (5 first-page search slots this week) but it skews to skeptical inquiry, which underlines how thin the brand's own community footprint is against an install base above 100,000.
