 TOP DECLINES THIS WEEK

No dimensions declined this week — every dimension held flat or moved up week-over-week.

01

Product Quality

- 0.0

7.3/10

The product story keeps quietly improving where the brand controls the experience — App Store performance complaints have flipped from drag to asset, satisfied-user mentions hit a new high, and the structured-journey format still earns unprompted praise at a density nothing else generates. The drag on the score is no longer the content; it's everywhere around it. The negative product reviews this week describe billing rage with a throwaway line about the lessons tacked on. Fix the checkout and the product profile improves without touching a single feature.

Marketing vs realityMixed · 6.5

The gap between what's promised and what's delivered keeps narrowing on the content side and stays wide on the checkout side. App Store bug and performance complaints continued to resolve this week (now 4.4 and 4.3 stars), and 24 reviews specifically praised how well the lessons fit their use case — up from 16 last week. The reviews that still pair a complaint with 'rehashed information' overwhelmingly lead with a refund grievance, not a content one.

Unique value propositionHealthy · 7.5

The structured-journey format is now earning unprompted praise at densities the rest of the dataset can't match. 118 App Store reviews this week landed in the 'satisfied users' theme averaging 4.8 stars (up from 113), 25 specifically called the lessons approachable (up from 18), and 24 cited the use case fitting their goal (up from 16). The core experience is the brand's strongest asset and it's compounding.

Accessibility & consistencyHealthy · 8

The performance scare from a month ago is now a durable strength — App Store mentions of performance nearly tripled this week (19 reviews, up from 7) and the average rating climbed to 4.3 stars from 3.1. Bug complaints resolved to 4.4 stars. The one remaining soft spot is Google Play, where the rating edged down a hair to 4.05 — small enough to call flat, but it's the second week in a row the gap with the App Store has widened.

02

Customer Service

— 0.0

6.2/10

Support has become the loudest positive signal in the entire scorecard. App Store reviewers mentioned customer support 18 times this week, up from 4 — and they are now naming individual agents by name (a reviewer this week described Jasmine as 'professional, responsive, understanding, and genuinely committed to helping resolve my concern'). The reply machine also healed the Trustpilot slip from last week: company replies to negative reviews returned to 100% across all three platforms. The structural caveat is unchanged — a reply is still not the same as a resolution, and the cost of this manual approach scales linearly with volume.

Support channel availabilityMixed · 6

Coverage is unchanged — email and the help portal carry everything, with no live chat or phone tier. What looks like a thin channel mix is being more than compensated for by the human quality of the replies, but the structural gap remains: when volume grows, the same email queue absorbs it. The next investment that would actually move this score is a tooling one, not a hiring one.

Response speed & qualityHealthy · 7.5

Support is now the standout positive in the whole scorecard. App Store mentions of customer support more than quadrupled this week (18 reviews at 4.7 stars, up from 4), Google Play mentions tripled (8 reviews, up from 3), and reviewers are now thanking specific agents by name — Jasmine on the App Store this week, Andrew last week. Reviewers used phrases like 'impressed (unexpectedly in truth)' and 'A+++.' The pattern has tipped from invisible to brand-defining.

Complaint resolution rateMixed · 5

The 'every unhappy customer hears back' promise is fully restored across all platforms. App Store and Google Play held at 100% reply coverage on negative reviews, and Trustpilot recovered last week's slip — reply rates returned to 100%. But answering is still not resolving: the historical record of formally closed complaints stays well below the reply rate, and that gap is why the criterion sits where it does despite near-perfect responsiveness.

03

User Feedback

6.6/10

Trustpilot quietly crossed 20,000 reviews this week — a milestone that should be the headline, except for the asterisk attached: 99% of those reviews came from company invitations. Underneath that, the news is good. Google Play sentiment recovered the wobble it had two weeks ago, the responsiveness slip on Trustpilot resolved, and outright dissatisfied mentions stayed flat at low single digits. The structural authenticity question hasn't moved — the brand has the data to prove an organic core exists, but the visible review stream is almost entirely a company-selected list.

Review volume & ratingHealthy · 7.6

Trustpilot crossed the 20,000-review milestone this week, adding 612 new reviews at a stable 4.4-star average — a 3.1% increase. The App Store added 476 reviews at 4.6 stars, and Google Play added 84 at a slightly slipped 4.05. Volume growth is broad-based across all three platforms and ratings are stable everywhere — a healthier picture than the dashboard tends to show.

Sentiment & platform consistencyMixed · 6

Google Play sentiment recovered the wobble — machine sentiment there climbed to 80% positive (up from 70 last week) and the negative share fell to 11%. The App Store held at 83% positive. The two stores are converging again instead of diverging, which is the consistency the criterion was downgraded for two weeks ago. Outright dissatisfied mentions also stayed flat at low single digits across both stores.

Review authenticity signalsMixed · 4.5

Trustpilot's invited share is now 99% — essentially the entire visible review stream is solicited rather than spontaneous. The one bright spot is that the compliance-label situation stayed clean for a second straight week, with no flagged reviews this cycle. The independent authenticity tracker RealReviews still places RiseGuide mid-pack at 4.4 stars across 86 ratings. The headline numbers are real; the audience producing them is almost entirely a company-selected list.

Company responsiveness to reviewsHealthy · 8.3

Reply coverage is now at 100% on every platform tracked. The App Store and Google Play held at 100% on negative reviews, and Trustpilot recovered last week's slip — the reply rate is back to 100% across the visible sample. With all three platforms simultaneously at full coverage, this is now the cleanest signal in the scorecard.

The billing story split sharply by store this week. On the App Store, pricing complaints climbed in volume but improved in tone — payment grievances fell from 12 to 8 and the average pricing-review rating jumped from 2.0 to 3.4. On Google Play the opposite happened: pricing reviews sit at 1.1 stars (down from 1.7), payment reviews at 1.1 stars (down from 1.5), and the language is the unmistakable register of users who feel actively defrauded. The cancellation guide still helps the people who find it, and a new pattern is emerging on the App Store side where the subscription anger is reclassifying — Privacy and Security & Accounts mentions both more than doubled, suggesting users now frame the same charge complaint as a trust violation, not just a billing one.

Price disclosure

Mixed · 5

The two stores are pulling in opposite directions on pricing clarity. App Store pricing mentions doubled to 22 this week and the average rating climbed from 2.0 to 3.4 stars — a meaningful improvement in how users describe the pricing they encounter. Google Play pricing held at 7 mentions but the average dropped from 1.7 to 1.1 stars. The progress on one store is real; the regression on the other is just as real, and the criterion sits flat because they cancel.

Hidden / recurring charges

Critical · 2.5

Users still describe being defrauded, not misinformed — and the language this week is even sharper. Google Play reviewers used 'predatory subscription' and 'charged €49.99 without a single notification', and on the App Store the same complaint is migrating from the Payment label to Privacy and Security & Accounts (both topics roughly doubled this week). The explicit 'you will be charged today' confirmation step remains the single highest-leverage fix available.

Ease of cancellation

Mixed · 4.5

The cancellation guide works for the users who reach it — but new reviews still report being trapped: 'I unsubscribed from the app over a month ago and they're still charging me' and 'they were charging me for months from an old account, app couldn't cancel.' The documentation exists; the problem is purely discoverability. Linking the guide from the in-app billing screen and the store listings would move this criterion without writing a word of new content.

UI dark patterns

Critical · 2.3

Trustpilot's compliance-label situation stayed clean for a second straight week — no flagged reviews this cycle. But the underlying pattern the company itself acknowledges in its replies — charging before a stated renewal date, no email receipt — is still generating reviews this week, and the fact that App Store users are now framing the same complaint as a Privacy or Security & Accounts issue suggests the perception is hardening, not fading.

Refund policy clarity & enforcementCritical · 3

Refunds still run on negotiation, not policy. One reviewer thanked an agent for an instant refund this week; another wrote there was 'a lot of back-and-forth, and they tried to bargain with me instead of just processing' the request. With no refund policy published on the website, every refund is a private bargain whose outcome depends on who you reach. A published policy is the cheapest credibility fix in this dimension.

The 'is this legit?' question still gets answered by everyone except the brand. The skeptical Reddit thread that surfaced last week climbed to the #1 result for 'riseguide reviews' this cycle, the founder remains invisible, and the strongest positive third-party signal — a 55,000-view creator review — is now growing more slowly than the scam-flag video chasing it. The brand controls the answer to its own credibility and keeps declining to give one.

Company age & history

Critical · 3

Still young in category, and the only fast lever — a credible founder story — still doesn't exist. The company is roughly two years old and the app about six months. Time fixes this eventually, but right now the sole public record of who runs RiseGuide is a name in business-registration filings, which is not the kind of history that builds trust.

Legal & brand identity alignmer

Mixed · 5.3

The durable good news held: Trustpilot's compliance labels stayed clean for a second straight week, the main scam-flagging sites stayed out of the top results, and RiseGuide.com owns 6 of the visible first-page slots. The new wrinkle is a skeptical Reddit thread climbing to the #1 position for 'riseguide reviews' searches — worth watching, but it's a curious user, not a fraud accusation.

Third-party recognition

Mixed · 4.7

The brand's best independent endorsement keeps growing but is decelerating — the standout creator review crossed 55,000 views (up from 54,600), and the skeptical 'is it a scam?' video also slowed to 14,400 views (up from 14,000). The catch is the creator-versus-audience split that won't close: across sampled videos 73% were positive, but their comment sections ran only 30% positive. The creators are sold; their viewers are still deciding.

Leadership transparency

Critical · 3

The longest-running flat criterion in the report. No founder bio shipped this week, no About page, no leadership presence in any search result. Meanwhile one App Store reviewer this week told future readers to 'search Reddit for REAL reviews' — the kind of advice the brand cannot rebut as long as there is no person to put behind it. A short, photographed founder bio remains the single most fixable lift anywhere in this scorecard.

Online presence consistency

Mixed · 6.3

Where the brand controls the message it's perfectly aligned — the same support contacts appear across the website, both app stores, Trustpilot and business directories, and RiseGuide-owned domains gained a SERP slot this week (now 6, up from 5). The gap is community presence: Reddit visibility is rising fastest of all (6 first-page slots, up from 4), but it skews to skeptical inquiry, which underlines how thin the brand's own community footprint is against an install base above 100,000.
