

Riseguide Reputation Scorecard

Independent weekly reputation analysis · July 13, 2026

KEYWORDS ANALYSED

- riseguide
- riseguide app
- riseguide reviews

COMPOSITE SCORE

July 13, 2026

5.4_{/10}

— 0.0

was 5.4 · July 6, 2026

REVIEW PLATFORM SCORES

Trustpilot

4.4

22,472 reviews

Apple App Store

4.6

16,369 reviews

Google Play

4.1

3,480 reviews

Reviews.io

4.7

244 reviews

RealReviews.io

4.5

109 reviews

BBB

13

11 unresolved / 3 yr

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY · THIS WEEK VS LAST WEEK

			LAST WEEK	CURRENT	Δ
01	Product Quality		7.2 _{/10}	7.2 _{/10}	— 0.0
02	Customer Service		5.7 _{/10}	5.8 _{/10}	▲ +0.1
03	User Feedback		6.6 _{/10}	6.6 _{/10}	— 0.0
04	Billing Transparency		3.2 _{/10}	3.2 _{/10}	— 0.0
05	Brand Trust & Legitimacy		4.4 _{/10}	4.4 _{/10}	— 0.0

▲ TOP IMPROVEMENTS THIS WEEK

02 Customer Service

5.8_{/10} ▲ +0.1

Response speed & quality — Support came back into the conversation this week — and as praise. After falling silent last week, customer service re-entered the App Store with 10 mentions averaging 4.6 stars, reviewers volunteering that the team is responsive and genuinely helpful. When this team is visible it's usually because someone had a good experience, and this week they were visible again. It's the single biggest positive move anywhere in the report.

▼ TOP DECLINES THIS WEEK

No dimensions declined this week — every dimension held flat or moved up week-over-week.

01

Product Quality

- 0.0

7.2/10

The two app stores swapped roles this week. The App Store — last week's problem child — healed sharply, its harshest reviews thinning out, while Google Play became the noisy one. Underneath the churn the product itself is unchanged: people who finish the structured journey still rate it near-perfect, and the loudest complaints remain about billing and trust, not the lessons. The one product-side thing worth watching — bug talk on the App Store — ticked up again but stayed non-damning, so the stability watch continues without escalating into a real regression.

Marketing vs realityMixed · 6.5

The 'it's really just AI content' accusation has hardened into the standard credibility jab — it recurs on both stores and even in video comments, but never dents the core. One App Store reviewer this week dismissed the lessons as 'AI generated videos,' and a video commenter added 'this short is AI too.' It's still a handful of voices against a dominant five-star base: 74 of 100 App Store reviews and 34 of 69 Google Play reviews landed at five stars. The framing attacks trust, not quality, so the score holds.

Unique value propositionHealthy · 7.5

The structured-journey format is the one thing that gets stronger no matter what else wobbles. Satisfied-user praise on the App Store grew from 67 mentions to 84 this week, averaging 4.7 stars, and 'genuinely helpful, easy to follow' stayed the densest positive theme anywhere in the data. While the two stores pulled apart on billing and sentiment, the reason people love the product didn't move at all. The differentiator is real, and this week it deepened.

Accessibility & consistencyHealthy · 7.5

Last week's stability watch hasn't turned into a real regression. Bug mentions on the App Store rose again — from 5 to 8 — but they average a middling 3.8 stars, not the one-star fury that signals something broke, and Google Play's speed complaints actually eased from 8 to 3. The topic is still on the board rather than off it, so it stays worth a periodic check, but nothing this week suggests an actual reliability slide.

02

Customer Service

▲ +0.1

5.8/10

Support quietly reversed this week. After going silent, it reappeared on the App Store as an unprompted compliment — proof the team is a real strength whenever it's visible. But the underlying shape is unchanged: everyone gets an answer, not everyone gets a resolution, and Google Play's billing complaints are exactly the kind a reply can't close. The whole operation still rides on one email inbox with no live-chat or phone fallback, so a genuine complaint spike would land in the one channel that has no surge capacity.

Support channel availabilityMixed · 6

Coverage hasn't changed — email and the help portal still carry every conversation, with no live chat or phone line. The model works while volume is steady, but it has no shock absorber: when billing anger spikes on a given store, as it did on Google Play this week, the same single inbox absorbs all of it. The next improvement that would actually move this score is a tooling investment, not another support hire.

Response speed & qualityMixed · 6.5

▲ +0.5

Support went quiet last week; this week it came back, and as a compliment. Customer service re-entered the App Store conversation with 10 mentions averaging 4.6 stars — reviewers volunteering that the team is responsive and helpful rather than raising a problem. It's a reminder that when this team is visible, it's usually because someone had a good experience. Google Play was the exception, where its two support mentions were billing-driven and unhappy.

Complaint resolution rateMixed · 5

Every unhappy customer still gets a reply — 100% of negative reviews on the App Store, Google Play and Trustpilot drew a company response this week — but a reply still isn't a resolution. Google Play reviewers describe being 'charged double with no warning' and a support team 'hiding behind their policy,' while another is 'still waiting' on a refund. Responsiveness is a solved problem; converting a reply into a resolved outcome is where the billing anger keeps pooling.

03

User Feedback

- 0.0

6.6/10

The top-line stayed healthy — volume compounding, ratings steady — but the movement underneath is what matters. The two stores split again with the sides reversed: Google Play is now the one sliding, its positive sentiment down sharply and its one-star reviews doubling. The one clear relief landed on the most-contested criterion — last week's fraud-flag scare on Trustpilot receded to a single routine flag. The numbers are real; the Google Play slide is the thing to manage before it reaches the blended average.

Review volume & rating

Healthy · 8.2

Growth stayed broad and the ratings under it held — the clean part of the picture. Trustpilot added 538 reviews this week, a 2.5% increase, holding at 4.4 stars; Google Play grew about 3% to roughly 3,480 reviews near 4.1; and the App Store passed 16,300 reviews at 4.6. When volume keeps rising this steadily without dragging the average down, it reads as genuine momentum rather than a solicitation push. The healthy top-line is intact.

Sentiment & platform consistency

Mixed · 5

▼ -0.5

The two stores split again this week, but the sides swapped. Where the App Store softened last week, this week it recovered and Google Play fell sharply: positive sentiment there dropped from 79% to 58%, and one-star reviews more than doubled, from 8 to 18. The blended average still looks stable, which is exactly the trap — underneath it Google Play is now the platform sliding, and the drop is steep enough to treat as this week's real signal.

Review authenticity signals

Mixed · 4.8

▲ +0.3

Last week's alarming spike in compliance flags — and their shift to blunt fraud claims — reversed this week. The flag count fell from four to one, and the single remaining flag is a routine billing information-request on a 2-star review, not a fraud allegation. The independent tracker RealReviews also nudged up to 4.5 stars. The lasting asterisk is unchanged — about 97% of Trustpilot reviews are still company-invited — but the acute scare eased, and the score recovers a little of its lost ground.

Company responsiveness to reviews

Healthy · 8.3

Still the cleanest signal on the board. Every negative review on the App Store, Google Play and Trustpilot got a company reply this week, and overall reply coverage held at essentially 100% across all three. Whatever stays contested about how RiseGuide gathers its reviews, no unhappy customer is being left unanswered — a defensible, genuine strength that costs nothing to maintain and quietly underwrites the rest of the reputation story.

Billing is still the brand's deepest wound, and this week it moved house — from the App Store to Google Play. The App Store, last week's epicenter, eased: payment complaints fell and its harshest reviews thinned. Google Play took its place, with pricing anger crashing to barely one star and reviews reading 'automatically renew without your consent' and 'complete scam.' The mechanism behind all of it is unchanged and singular: there's still no cancel button inside the app, so users feel trapped in the renewal they're then billed for. This is a product gap generating fraud-grade anger, not a disclosure nuance.

Price disclosure

Mixed · 4.5

The two stores traded places this week. App Store pricing complaints held steady and their average actually improved slightly, while Google Play's pricing anger crashed — from an already-poor 2.8-star average to just 1.1 — with reviewers describing 'a premium subscription with automatic renewal at double the price... without the user having subscribed.' The relief on one store is cancelled by the collapse on the other. The recurring story is unchanged: a price users read as one-time that quietly becomes recurring.

Hidden / recurring charges

Critical · 2

Still the worst signal on the entire scorecard, and this week the anger simply relocated. App Store payment complaints eased from 15 to 12, but Google Play's grew angrier — payment reviews there now average one star flat, with language like 'they charged me double with no warning' and 'automatically renew without your consent, with no option to unsubscribe.' The total volume barely moved; what changed is which store feels robbed. The one high-leverage fix — a charge-confirmation step before purchase — still hasn't shipped.

Ease of cancellation

Mixed · 4

The missing in-app cancel button is still the single mechanism tying every billing complaint together. This week's Google Play reviews repeat it almost word for word: 'no option to unsubscribe,' 'automatically renew without your consent.' The help guide still rescues whoever finds it, but it can't close the product gap that turns a billing surprise into a fraud accusation. Linking the guide from the in-app billing screen is the cheap half of the fix; a real in-app cancel path is the half that matters.

UI dark patterns

Critical · 2.3

The pattern the company itself acknowledges — charging before a clearly stated renewal date, with no email receipt — kept generating the same reviews this week, now loudest on Google Play. One relief: the compliance flags that spiked last week receded from four to one, and that one is a routine billing query rather than a fraud claim. But the perception that checkout is engineered against the user hasn't softened; it just changed which store voices it.

Refund policy clarity & enforcement

Critical · 3

Refunds still run on negotiation, not policy. This week a Google Play customer charged twice was met by a support team 'hiding behind their policy,' while another is 'still waiting for a response regarding a refund.' With no refund policy published on the website, every outcome depends on which agent happens to answer. A clear, public refund policy remains the cheapest credibility fix anywhere in this dimension — and its absence is what keeps every refund a fresh argument.

The 'is this legit?' question is still answered mostly by outsiders — and this week the brand gave back a little of the search ground it won last week. Company-owned pages slipped from six of the top results to five, and the skeptical Reddit thread ('Has anyone tried riseguide.com?') climbed back into the top results after dropping out. The one bright spot: Trustpilot's fraud-flag scare receded to a single routine flag. But the scam-framed video still sits above 15,000 views atop comment sections far more skeptical than the creators who made them, and the founder remains invisible — still the single most fixable line in the whole scorecard.

Company age & history

Critical · 3

Still young and still faceless. The company is roughly two years old and the app about six months, and the only public record of who runs it remains a name on business-registration filings. Time will eventually harden into credibility on its own, but the one lever available today — a real founder story attached to a real person — still hasn't been pulled, and nothing this week changed that.

Legal & brand identity alignmer

Mixed · 5.3

▲ +0.3

The needle moved the right way this week. The Trustpilot compliance flags that spiked to four last week — and had shifted into blunt fraud accusations — fell back to a single routine billing query, and no scam-flagging site cracked the top results for 'riseguide reviews.' It's not a clean bill of health: reviewers still throw around 'complete scam' and a skeptical video persists. But the acute legal-risk signal eased, and the score recovers the ground it lost last week.

Third-party recognition

Mixed · 4.7

Independent coverage is still a real asset — several 'is it worth it?' reviews rank on the first page and the app-overview video has been seen over 316,000 times — and creator sentiment even ticked up this week. But the gap between creators and their audiences is still the story: sampled videos ran about 73% positive while their comment sections sat near 39%, one commenter warning 'Scam!!!! Beware!! I was charged but I could not access the app.' The scam-framed review video still holds above 15,000 views.

Leadership transparency

Critical · 3

The longest-running flat line in the report, and still the biggest free win. No founder bio, no About page, no leadership presence anywhere in this week's search results — again — while reviewers openly accuse the brand of fraud. The absence of a named, photographed person to stand behind the product isn't a missing nicety; it's the void those accusations rush to fill. A short founder bio with a real photo remains the single highest score-per-effort fix anywhere in this scorecard.

Online presence consistencyMixed · 6*▼ -0.3

Last week's search-footprint gain gave some ground back. Company-owned pages slipped from six of the top thirty results to five, and the skeptical Reddit thread — 'Has anyone tried riseguide.com?' — climbed back into the top results after dropping out last week. Where RiseGuide controls the message the branding stays perfectly consistent across the website, both stores and Trustpilot; but this week it controls slightly less of the search real estate, and a doubter's voice sits higher in it.