▲ TOP IMPROVEMENTS THIS WEEK

03 User Feedback

6.7_{/10} ▲ +0.1

Review volume & rating — Volume growth is broad and the ratings underneath it are steady-to-improving — the healthiest version of this picture in weeks. Trustpilot added roughly 480 reviews this week, a 2.3% increase, holding at 4.4 stars; Google Play added about 80 and ticked up to 4.06; and the App Store kept climbing past 15,900 reviews at 4.6. When volume rises without dragging the rating down, that reads as organic momentum rather than a solicitation push.

▼ TOP DECLINES THIS WEEK

02 Customer Service

5.8_{/10} ▼ -0.4

Response speed & quality — The breakout support story has cooled back to normal. App Store mentions of customer support fell from 18 to 5 this cycle and Google Play from 8 to 1 — the earlier surge was a one-week event, not a new baseline. Tone softened too: a reviewer who cancelled but kept getting charged left unsatisfied after contacting support. Replies are still prompt and mostly positive, but support is no longer the runaway headline it briefly looked like.

05 Brand Trust & Legitimacy

4.3_{/10} ▼ -0.2

Legal & brand identity alignment — The mostly-clean record picked up a blemish this week. After two weeks with no issues, two Trustpilot reviews were flagged for verification — both alleging the app's content and glowing reviews are AI-generated. Dedicated scam-flagging sites still aren't ranking and the skeptical Reddit thread held at the third search result rather than climbing, but the return of compliance flags, paired with the AI-fabrication accusation, is enough to tick this down.

01

Product Quality

- 0.0

7.3/10

The product itself isn't what generates RiseGuide's bad reviews — billing is — and this week a new accusation joined the pile: that the lessons and ads are 'AI-generated.' Where the experience is unmediated by checkout, the data stays strong: 70 of 100 App Store reviews this week were five stars, satisfied-user mentions remain the densest theme in the dataset, and Google Play's rating even nudged back up to 4.06. The product story is healthy; the noise around it is migrating from 'rehashed content' to 'fake AI content' — and both are really trust complaints wearing a product costume.

Marketing vs realityMixed · 6.5

The promise-versus-reality gap is stable, but the complaint is mutating. Where users once said 'rehashed content,' a handful now claim the lessons and ads are 'AI-generated' — an accusation that surfaced in Google Play reviews and got two Trustpilot reviews flagged for verification this week. Volume is still low and the five-star core is intact, with 70 of 100 App Store reviews landing at five stars, so the score holds. But the new framing attacks credibility rather than quality, and it's worth watching.

Unique value propositionHealthy · 7.5

The structured-journey format remains the brand's strongest asset, still earning unprompted praise at a density nothing else matches. This week 69 App Store reviews and 38 Google Play reviews landed in the satisfied-user theme at 4.8 to 4.9 stars, and reviewers again singled out how approachable the lessons feel and how well they fit a specific goal. The unusually high mention count from earlier in June has normalized, but the underlying signal is unchanged: people who finish the journey love it.

Accessibility & consistencyHealthy · 8

The performance scare from spring stays firmly resolved — when users mention speed and stability now they do so positively, averaging 4.3 stars, and the gap that had been opening with Google Play actually closed this week as its rating edged back up to 4.06. Fewer performance complaints surfaced overall, which is the quiet kind of good news: the topic has receded from the conversation rather than turning negative. Stability is no longer a story here.

02

Customer Service

▼ -0.4

5.8/10

Last month's 'support is our breakout asset' story was real, but it was a one-week surge — not a new baseline. This week support mentions fell back to ordinary levels and the tone cooled: a reviewer who'd cancelled was still charged and came away unsatisfied after contacting the team. The reply machine is still flawless on paper — every negative review on the App Store, Google Play and Trustpilot drew a company response. The standing truth is unchanged: RiseGuide answers everyone, but answering isn't resolving, and the whole operation still rests on hand-written email replies with no live chat or phone option.

Support channel availabilityMixed · 6

Coverage is unchanged — email and the help portal carry every conversation, with no live chat or phone line. The model works while volume is manageable, but it has no shock absorber: when complaints spike, the same inbox absorbs them. The next improvement that would actually move this score is a tooling investment, not another hire.

Response speed & qualityMixed · 6.5

▼ -1.0

The breakout support story has settled back to normal. App Store mentions of customer support dropped from 18 to 5 this cycle and Google Play from 8 to 1 — confirming the earlier surge was a one-week event rather than a step change. Tone softened as well: one reviewer who cancelled but kept being charged left unsatisfied after reaching out. Replies remain prompt and largely positive, but support is no longer the standout it briefly appeared to be.

Complaint resolution rateMixed · 5

The 'every unhappy customer hears back' promise held perfectly — every negative review across the App Store, Google Play and Trustpilot drew a company reply this week. But a reply still isn't a resolution: the share of complaints that actually get closed out trails the response rate, and this week's 'cancelled but still charged, then told no refund' reviews are exactly that gap in action. Responsiveness is solved; resolution isn't.

03

User Feedback

▲ +0.1

6.7/10

Review volume keeps compounding healthily — Trustpilot added nearly 500 reviews this week at a rock-steady 4.4 stars, and Google Play's rating even nudged up. But the authenticity asterisk got louder, not quieter: after two clean weeks, two reviews were flagged this cycle — and the accusation inside them is that the glowing reviews are AI-generated fakes. The volume story is excellent; the credibility story is the one that needs managing.

Review volume & ratingHealthy · 7.9

▲ +0.3

Volume growth is broad and the ratings underneath it are steady-to-improving — the healthiest version of this picture in weeks. Trustpilot added roughly 480 reviews this week, a 2.3% increase, while holding at 4.4 stars; Google Play added about 80 reviews and actually ticked up to 4.06; and the App Store kept climbing past 15,900 reviews at 4.6. When volume rises without dragging the rating down, that's the closest thing to organic-feeling momentum the dashboard shows.

Sentiment & platform consistencyMixed · 6

The two app stores are reading almost identically now — both sit around 73% positive in machine sentiment — which is exactly the consistency this criterion tracks, and Google Play even trimmed its negative share. The one soft spot is the App Store, where positive sentiment eased a few points from its spring high, but nothing moved far enough to call a trend. After weeks of the stores diverging, they've settled back into line.

Review authenticity signalsMixed · 4.5

The invited-review problem eased slightly this week — 97.5% of Trustpilot reviews still came from company invitations, down a touch from near-total — but the headline authenticity event was the return of compliance flags. After two clean weeks, two reviews were flagged, and both allege the positive reviews are 'AI-generated.' The independent tracker RealReviews still places RiseGuide mid-pack at 4.4 stars across 91 ratings. The numbers hold; the accusation that they're manufactured is what caps this score.

Company responsiveness to reviewsHealthy · 8.3

Still the cleanest signal in the scorecard. Every negative review on the App Store, Google Play and Trustpilot received a company reply this week, and overall reply coverage held at 100% across all three platforms. Whatever else is contested about RiseGuide's reviews, no unhappy customer is being left unanswered — and that consistency is a genuine, defensible strength.

Billing remains the brand's deepest wound, and the language hardened again this week — Google Play reviewers called it 'fraud,' 'criminals,' and 'auto debit without consent,' and a new twist appeared: a 'fraud of AI-generated content.' App Store pricing complaints thinned in number but the ones that remain are furious, averaging under 1.5 stars. The cancellation guide still rescues whoever finds it, but reviewers keep reporting there's no cancel button in the app at all. Every billing topic on Google Play now averages around one to two stars — the rating people leave when they feel robbed, not when they're merely confused.

Price disclosure

Mixed · 5

The two stores keep pulling in opposite directions, so the score sits still. App Store pricing complaints dropped to 8 this week but turned sharply angrier, averaging 1.4 stars down from 3.4, while Google Play pricing complaints rose to 10 but eased slightly to 2.0 stars. Fewer-but-furious on one side, more-but-milder on the other — the net read on how clearly users feel pricing was disclosed simply hasn't moved.

Hidden / recurring charges

Critical · 2.5

Users still describe being robbed, not misinformed, and this week's language is blunt: 'they will rip you off,' 'auto debit your account without your consent,' 'criminals.' A Trustpilot reviewer warned of a 'hidden auto-renewal at a higher price.' The single highest-leverage fix is unchanged — an explicit 'you will be charged today' confirmation step before purchase — and nothing in this week's reviews suggests it has shipped.

Ease of cancellation

Mixed · 4.5

The documentation rescues whoever reaches it, but reviewers keep hitting a wall the guide can't solve: there's no cancel button in the app. One wrote this week that the cancellation 'functionality does not exist on the app'; another said they were charged for months from an old account they couldn't cancel. This is a discoverability and product-gap problem, not a content one — linking the guide from the in-app billing screen is the cheap half of the fix.

UI dark patterns

Critical · 2.3

The pattern the company itself acknowledges — charging before a clearly stated renewal date with no email receipt — is still generating angry reviews, and the auto-renewal complaint surfaced again on Trustpilot this week. Compliance flags also returned after two clean weeks, though this cycle's flags were about content authenticity rather than billing. The perception that the checkout is engineered against the user is hardening, not fading.

Refund policy clarity & enforcementCritical · 3

Refunds still run on negotiation, not policy. This week a reviewer who cancelled but kept being charged was told the renewal wouldn't be refunded, while others describe back-and-forth bargaining before any money is returned. With no refund policy published on the website, every outcome depends on which agent you reach. A clear, public refund policy remains the cheapest credibility fix anywhere in this dimension.

The 'is this legit?' question is still being answered by everyone except RiseGuide — and this week the brand's own footprint got thinner while the skeptics' did not. Company-owned pages lost search ground, falling to 4 of the top 30 results from 6; two reviews were flagged alleging the testimonials are AI-fabricated; and a 'is this a scam?' video crossed 15,000 views. The founder remains invisible. The single most fixable item in the entire scorecard — a real, named leadership page — still doesn't exist, and this week it stopped being a missing nicety and became an active liability.

Company age & history

Critical · 3

Still young and still faceless. The company is roughly two years old and the app about six months, and the only public record of who runs it is a name on business-registration filings. Time will age the brand into credibility eventually, but the one lever available now — a credible founder story — still hasn't been pulled.

Legal & brand identity alignment

Mixed · 5

▼ -0.3

The mostly-clean record picked up a blemish. After two weeks with no issues, two Trustpilot reviews were flagged for verification this week — both alleging the app's content and reviews are AI-generated. Dedicated scam-flagging sites still aren't ranking, and the skeptical Reddit thread held at the third search result rather than climbing, so this isn't a fraud finding. But the return of compliance flags, attached to an authenticity accusation, is enough to move the score down.

Third-party recognition

Mixed · 4.7

Independent coverage stays a real asset — several 'is it worth it?' creator reviews rank on the first page and the brand's app overview has been seen over 300,000 times. But two cracks widened this week: the 'is this a scam?' video crossed 15,000 views, and the gap between sold creators and skeptical audiences grew. Across sampled videos 73% were positive, while their comment sections ran only 38% positive — with negative comments roughly doubling their share. The creators are convinced; their viewers increasingly aren't.

Leadership transparency

Critical · 3

The longest-running flat line in the report. No founder bio, no About page, no leadership presence anywhere in this week's search results — yet again. With reviewers now openly accusing the brand of manufacturing its own testimonials, the absence of a real, named, photographed person to stand behind the product has shifted from a missing nicety to an active liability. A short, photographed founder bio remains the single highest score-per-effort fix anywhere in this scorecard.

Online presence consistencyMixed · 6*▼ -0.3

Where RiseGuide controls the message it's still perfectly aligned — the same contacts and branding appear across the website, both app stores, Trustpilot and business directories. But its search footprint thinned this week: company-owned pages fell from 6 of the top 30 results to 4, with independent review sites taking the vacated slots. The replacements happen to be friendly this time, but ceding owned search real estate is the opposite of the direction this criterion needs to move.
